Lars Jansson: You Just Have to Roll Up Your Sleeves and Get to Work

Lars Jansson was perhaps one of the strangest creatures who lived in Moomin Valley. Tove Jansson's kid brother—twelve years her junior—was a writer, translator, professional Lapland gold-miner, aena, photographer, model for Snufkin, and, finally and most famously, a cartoonist. Lars, or Lasse as his family called him, published his first novel when he was fifteen years old and followed it with eight more over the years. He taught himself English because novels weren't being translated into Swedish quickly enough for his voracious appetite.

Lars was there at the creation of the Moomin comic strip, translating each strip to English as Tove wrote it in Swedish. This intimacy with the strip served him well when Tove's creative fatigue set in; he penned his first Moomin adventure—"Moomin Goes Wild West"—in 1956. With Tove's contract with Associated Newspapers set to expire in 1959, Lars began secretly teaching himself to cartoon under the guidance of his mother, Signe Hammarsten Jansson. Even though his parents and older sister were famous artists, Lars had never drawn or painted before. "Anyone entering my apartment would have considered me a lunatic. The whole place was full of all kinds of Moomin drawings," Lars said about these intensive training months.

The plan worked. Tove was thrilled with the results of this secret plan and took the "Jansson Solution" to the syndicate. On February 1st, 1960, the first Moomin strip written and drawn by Lars Jansson was published. Lars continued to write and draw the beloved strip for another fifteen years—a tenure twice as long as his sister.

Lars's Moomin stories are remembered for their surprisingly British sense of humor and increasingly globe-trotting themes. Of his comics career, Lars said, "If you wait for inspiration, you'll never accomplish a thing. You just have to roll up your sleeves and get to work."

—Juhaní Toivanen, Moomin historian and author of the Tove and Lars Jansson biography, Moomin Every Day
